Ella Minnow Pea is a novel by Mark Dunn that tells the story of a small island community that is slowly losing its language. The novel is set in the fictional town of Nollop, which is located in the middle of the Atlantic Ocean. The town's only connection to the outside world is through a daily ferry that brings in supplies and news.

One day, the town's mayor decides to ban the use of the letter "e" in all public communication. This decision is met with resistance from the townspeople, who are afraid that they will lose their language if they are not allowed to use all of the letters of the alphabet. The mayor, however, is adamant, and he begins to enforce the ban with the help of the town's police force.

As the ban on the letter "e" continues, the townspeople begin to find creative ways to communicate without using the forbidden letter. They start to use euphemisms and circumlocutions, and they even invent new words to replace the ones that they can no longer use. However, the mayor is determined to stamp out all traces of the letter "e" from Nollop, and he eventually orders the burning of all books that contain the offending letter.

In the face of such adversity, the townspeople of Nollop begin to lose hope. They are afraid that their language will be completely destroyed, and that they will be cut off from the rest of the world. However, a small group of rebels, led by a young girl named Ella Minnow Pea, decide to fight back against the mayor's ban. They begin to write and distribute poems and songs that use the letter "e", and they even organize a protest rally outside the mayor's office.

The mayor is furious at the rebels' defiance, and he orders their arrest. However, the townspeople stand up for the rebels, and they refuse to let the mayor take them away. In the end, the mayor is forced to back down, and the ban on the letter "e" is lifted. The townspeople of Nollop are able to save their language, and they learn the importance of standing up for what they believe in.
