James Eager was born into slavery in Maryland in 1829. As a young man, he experienced firsthand the horrors of the plantation system. He was beaten, whipped, and sold away from his family. Despite these hardships, Eager never lost his faith in God.

In 1863, Eager was emancipated by the Emancipation Proclamation. He moved to Baltimore, where he worked as a laborer and became involved in the local African Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1879, Eager founded his own church, the Church of God and Saints of Christ. The church quickly grew in popularity, and Eager soon became known as a powerful preacher and healer.

Eager's teachings were based on the belief that God is a loving and merciful Father who wants all people to be saved. He preached that salvation could be achieved through faith in Jesus Christ and obedience to God's commandments. Eager also emphasized the importance of worship, and he encouraged his followers to worship God in spirit and in truth.

Eager's church played an important role in the African American community. It provided a place of worship and fellowship for African Americans who were often excluded from white churches. The church also provided social services, such as food and clothing for the needy. Eager was a tireless advocate for the rights of African Americans, and he often spoke out against racism and discrimination.

Eager died in 1911, but his legacy continues to live on. The Church of God and Saints of Christ is still active today, and it has more than 200 churches in the United States and around the world. Eager's teachings continue to inspire people today, and he is remembered as one of the most important figures in African American religious history.
