Citizenship within the polis was a highly valued privilege, with only free adult males typically eligible. Women, slaves, and foreigners were generally excluded from formal political processes, although their roles in society varied depending on the specific polis.

The Assembly and the Council: Pillars of Democracy

The Assembly, composed of all eligible citizens, constituted the central decision-making body in the Greek Rule the Greek. Here, citizens could voice their opinions, debate proposals, and vote on a wide range of issues affecting the polis. The Assembly's powers extended to matters of war, peace, taxation, and even the election of officials.

Alongside the Assembly, the Council played a vital role in the political process. Elected or appointed for specific terms, these officials held responsibility for carrying out the decisions of the Assembly and Council. They managed finances, enforced laws, commanded armies, and represented the polis in its dealings with other states.

The most prominent magistrate in many poleis was the archon, who presided over the Assembly and the courts. Other magistrates included treasurers, tax collectors, and military commanders, each tasked with specific duties essential to the smooth functioning of the polis.
